Strong winds spun the dry leaves and dust around like mini tornadoes as Sandy and I disembarked the school bus at the end of our street. Ominous black clouds hid the sunshine. Splat! That was the sound of the first raindrop on my forehead. More raindrops came rapidly; hitting us so hard that they stung our exposed skin. We had to find shelter quickly.

Sandy grabbed my hand and pulled me along to the nearest house. As we stepped into the gallery, there was this bright flash of light followed immediately by a deafening "CRACK" and rumble. We trembled as we huddled in a corner with our coats over our heads.

We peeked as trees along the street danced vigorously in the pouring rain. Powerful winds whipped the branches to and fro as the leaves were ripped off. Powerlines snapped and fell sparking on the wet street. The next flash zigzagged across the sky like illuminated roots.

Gradually the rain stopped; the wind lulled, the flashes of lightning disappeared from view and the thunder became a low rumble as it moved farther away. We picked our way carefully down the street and viewed the scene before us. Every surface on the street was covered with debris. We looked in awe at all the damage done in such a short space of time.
