A Small Screen, Some Big Changes

How has TV changed our lives?

Before television, people got their news from the newspapers or the radio. For entertainment, they went to the theater to see live shows or movies, or had hobbies that they could do at home, such as stamp collecting or making model airplanes.

What was TV like in the early days?

TV started to become popular in the 1950s. In 1950, there were about 10 million televisions in the US. All the shows were in black and white. There were only one or two channels, and they were only on in the afternoons and evenings.

How did people watch TV back then?

In the early days of television, the family used to watch TV together because there was usually only one TV at home. The new idea of the "TV dinner" (frozen food that you can heat up and serve) became popular. In those days, watching TV was a family or social event. People were amazed that they could see live sports in their homes or get the latest news instantly.

How has TV changed?

In 1954, TV networks started to broadcast in color, and by 1970, there were 37 million color sets in the US. Today, TV sets are cheaper. We have 24-hour news and hundreds of channels. TV is no longer amazing. It is an accepted part of our daily lives.
