Food From Around the World

Costa Rica

One of the typical dishes of Costa Rica is Casado. The name refers to the marriage of its ingredients, which are served all together on one plate. It usually includes portions of rice, beans, salad, fried plantain (a large banana), cheese and some kind of meat like chicken, pork, beef or a fried filet of fish. Casado is served with tortillas. The best place to eat Casado in Costa Rica is at a Soda. Sodas are small local restaurants where traditional local dishes are served.

Spain

Paella is a typical Spanish dish cooked in a paellera, a large round pan. People used to cook rice and add different ingredients, such as snails or rabbit. An old story says that many years ago servants created dishes by mixing the leftovers from royal feasts in large pots to take home. Today, the most common ingredients are peas, green peppers, shrimp, mussels and chopped chicken and pork. A pinch of saffron gives paella its traditional yellow color. Paella is a flexible Spanish dish, but according to experts, one ingredient can never be changed: olive oil.

Brazil

Brigadeiro, Portuguese for Brigadier, is a popular candy in Brazil that is present at many Brazilian celebrations. It is made of condensed milk, cocoa powder, butter and chocolate sprinkles to decorate. Brigadeiro was first made in the 1940s. It is said that during World War II, milk and some fruits were not easy to get, so a group of creative women combined a few simple ingredients and created this local delicacy. The candy was named after Brigadeiro Eduardo Gomez, a very good-looking man, who once ran for president of Brazil.
