The Sufficiency Economy Philosophy

The philosophy of "Sufficiency Economy" provides a set of living and practical guidelines for people at all social levels starting from family to community and eventually the nation. On a larger scale, the principles stress the Buddhist middle path that can be applied by the private and public sectors in their development and management efforts, in particular at the national level in terms of economy and development in the global era. Sufficiency suggests moderation, reasonableness and the need for sound self-immunity given the impacts of external and internal changes. However, in order to achieve sufficiency, an application of knowledge with due consideration and prudence is essential. Great care is also needed in the utilization of theories and methodologies in every step of the planning and implementation process. Moral foundations meanwhile represent an essential element to be fostered, in particular among civil servants, theorists and the business communities at all levels through the cultivation of moral awareness, integrity and resourcefulness. Other qualities including perseverance, tolerance, conscience, wisdom and prudence required to achieve balance and the ability to cope appropriately with critical challenges arising from rapid and extensive socioeconomic, environmental and cultural changes in the world are also mandatory.

Compiled and extracted from His Majesty's many speeches and other related remarks on sufficiency economy, the promotion of the practical sufficiency principles began as the approach for all to adopt after royal permission was granted on November 29, 1999.
