When it comes to new year's resolutions, most of our goals tend to be about improving ourselves. And while that's certainly important, what about new year's resolutions to help other people? By lending a hand and showing empathy, we can make a huge difference to someone else's life. Often, they might just need a shoulder to cry on. Of course, that doesn't mean we should forget about taking care of ourselves. That is an essential part of living a healthy life. However, it's totally possible to spread good vibes to the people around us. There are definitely ways we can love ourselves and others through respect, gratitude and well, basic kindness. Fortunately, doing all of this is easier than it seems. You can even make a difference in your own class, home, village or town, no matter how big or small. Remember that you don't have to develop a new vaccine, build a palace or fly a rocket to the moon! Just think of the basics: how you approach others, the words you say, the things you do. It all adds up. To get you started, here are four simple new year's resolutions for you to consider. These actions might be small, but they can make quite a big difference.

1. Say "Thank you" more often.
2. Offer to help those in need – for example, an old lady crossing the street, a mum getting her baby's buggy off the bus, opening the door for someone who is carrying their shopping.
3. Donate things you don't need: toys, clothes – take them to a charity shop or give them to a needy person.
4. Pay a compliment. If someone is looking nice, or they have done something good, tell them.
