The light fitting was completely destroyed. There was a huge black mark on the ceiling where it had been burned, and the smell in the room was awful. Paul was standing there brushing hundreds of small pieces of glass out of his hair. Luckily, he hadn't been hurt. But he had come very close to it. It was at that point that I realized the dangers involved when someone doesn't really know what they're doing.

As so often in DIY, the problem turned out to be not that we had made a complete mess of the job, but that we had missed a tiny detail. A piece of metal in the part that connects the light fitting to the ceiling should have been covered with a special kind of tape. At least that's what the electrician who came to sort out the problem told me. With the tape, the light fitting would have been an attractive addition to the room. Without it, however, it was like a bomb.

My wife was used to my making a mess of things and paying twice as much to get them fixed as it would have cost to get a professional to do it in the first place. That day taught us all a lesson, though. I was not prepared to injure my friends just to save some money. And it seems I'm not the only one who's had enough of DIY. In just two years, the number of people aged 45 to 54 doing DIY has fallen by half, according to a report published this week.
