4. Read the following article, then write T (true) or F (false) according to the reading.

The internet is a useful source for looking up information. It makes life easy because you have access to the world with a single click. But what happens when you don't know what link to click on? Here are some stories about people who were in that situation.

My name is Mike. I'm in the third year of high school and I love the internet, but it's also a bit dangerous. When I have to do research for homework, I don't like to include information only from the Internet. I honestly prefer books and academic papers. Once I copied some incorrect information. Now I check the sources of what I read on the internet.

I'm Julia, and I like doing all my homework using of the internet. For my last geography homework, I looked up information about volcanoes in Latin America. I didn't check the website and I just printed the first link I found. My teacher asked me about the Amazon Volcano. I said, I think it is a river, and my teacher replied, "Why did you write it's a volcano?" I was so embarrassed.

I'm Carla and I don't enjoy doing homework on the internet. Last week, I had to do a literature homework about poets, and, to be honest, I didn't take my time to do it well. I just copied some information from a website. When I handed in my homework, I didn't realize I hadn't erased all the links and ads that were copied in the document. I got a Zero for my grade.
