The pandemic paused filming on the show back in March 2020, but it resumed six months later in September 2020. While an official release date hasn't been confirmed, the official Twitter account for the streaming platform dropped the new one-minute trailer back in November 2021, along with the caption: "We will have the best spring break, ever. Welcome to California. #StrangerThingsDay."

Fans have worked out this means the show will most likely air during springtime, with one tweeting: "Spring break, does that means this season gonna be release between March and April? I hope so!" while another said: "Yep, this will be released sometime around Spring Break because that's what they've done in previous years."

The Duffer Brothers have given us a small hint about what to expect from season four, and confirmed that good old Hopper is definitely alive and well! Chatting to Entertainment Weekly back in February 2020, they said: "We're excited to officially announce that production for Stranger

Things 4 is now underway—and even more excited to announce the return of Hopper!

"Although it's not all good news for our 'American'; [Hopper] is imprisoned far from home in the snowy wasteland of Kamchatka, Russia, where he will face dangers both human... and other. Meanwhile, back in the States, a new horror is beginning to surface, something long-buried, something that connects everything."

David Harbour added to Total Film: "I've known from the get-go... I've had those discussions with them [the Duffer brothers] from the very first season. We were always interested in that idea of the Gandalf resurrection – Gandalf the Grey who fights the Balrog and then becomes Gandalf the White."
