IV. Reading Comprehension: Read the passage below and answer the questions that follow.

FLORIDA'S ENDANGERED SPECIES

Florida, in the south of the USA, is a great place to be. There are beautiful beaches, swamps and forests. Florida is home to the Florida panther, the American alligator and the Key deer. There is the manatee, the green sea turtle and the roseate spoonbill. Sadly though, through a combination of habitat loss, hunting and accidents, all of these animals are under threat.

The Florida panther was at risk as early as the 1900s after settlers killed most of the panther population to protect their farm animals. As more and more settlers arrived, the panther had fewer places to hunt and less to eat. Now there are probably no more than 180 left in the wild.

The loss of just one species has a serious effect on all the others. Take the Florida alligator, for example. It is called a 'keynote' species. That means that they are important because they control number of other species (usually by eating them!). They also create 'alligator holes' - old nests that are used by other animals. The alligator may be a 'keynote' species and it may be the official state reptile of Florida, but it is still under threat from hunters who want its skin and meat. Without the alligator, Florida would lose several other species.

There is some hope. The warm, slow-moving waters of Florida are home to the manatee, a large seal-like creatures also known as the 'sea cow'. The manatee has been on the endangered list since 1967. In recent years, though, the number of births has been slightly more than the number of deaths. This has increased its numbers. There is still a lot of work to be done before all these endangered species can finally feel at home in their natural habitat.

V. Cloze Test: Choose the best answer for each gap.

Our oceans are full of garbage. While there are no current figures of exactly how much garbage is in there, it is estimated in 1975 that around 14 billion pounds of garbage are _____ (23) each year. Aside from just looking disgusting, all of this garbage poses a serious _____ (24) to wildlife who either confuse it as food or eat it _____ (25) . It is hard to estimate exactly how many animals are affected by plastic in the oceans each year, though some have put the number as _____ (26) as 100,000. While some groups are experimenting with large-scale devices to reduce the amount of marine debris, there currently isn't anything in place. Until this desperately-needed solution comes, it is on all of us to reduce the amount of litter generated so that it does not end up in the _____(27) or around the necks of ocean animals.
