The Mayas' Disappearance

The Mayas are recognized for their refined calendar and writing systems, architecture, and other aspects of their culture. They built magnificent temples and palaces and their territory extended along some southern parts of Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, and Belize. Around 900 A.D., most of those areas were abandoned. Nowadays, archeologists keep finding new temples that have been covered by the jungle for centuries. These findings have led people and scientists to wonder why the Mayans mysteriously disappeared after having flourished. Many hypotheses have been established to explain what could have happened to such a great civilization. Some scientists believe overpopulation may have caused a lack of resources. Others think they may have collapsed due to warfare. There are even some non-science-based ideas saying that the civilization might have been invaded by aliens or taken somewhere out space. However, more plausible options have been proposed by scholars whose last archeological investigations suggest that there was not one only reason for the collapse of the civilization but many consecutive events. Most of them agree that deforestation must have caused less rain which produced severe droughts and loss of crops. It could have led the Mayans to abandon so many cities.
