Once, there was a Czech ruler named Krok. He had three daughters: Kazi was a healer, Teta was a musician, and Libuše was the wisest of the three. She had the gift of seeing the future, so her father chose her to take over the kingdom. One day, while she was walking along a rocky cliff above the Vlatva River, she had a vision. "I see a great city whose glory will touch the stars," she said. Under her rule, a castle and a town were built on that very site. She declared that the town would be called Prague. Though she had proven herself to be wise, the tribe's men believed they deserved a male ruler. They demanded that she marry a noble, but she was in love with a humble farmer. She told them of a vision she had: a farmer with one broken sandal. She ordered them to bring her lover to her, because her vision proved that he was meant to be the king. She married the farmer, and they had three sons, who continued their dynasty in the Czech lands.
