For the beginner, buying organic can seem daunting. Not so long ago the very word was associated with nut roasts and the kind of shop where every other ingredient was tofu, and where asking for a Coca-Cola would elicit the same reaction as going into the supermarket and demanding cocaine.

Mercifully, those days are gone. But the range of choice that has replaced that austere, vegan mentality is equally confusing. Where do you begin?

"Buy locally," says the chef and smallholder, Hugh Fearnley - Whitting stall, whose series, TV Dinners, proved he is willing to eat just about anything - as long as it is GM-free.

The proliferation of farmers' markets means even hardened city dwellers can buy fresh produce and be sure about its provenance. You can find your nearest market online at www.farmersmarkets.net, while the Soil Association's Organic Directory lists thousands of organic shops. And where else could you learn about where your food has come from, chat with your friendly neighbourhood herb farmer and find yourself stuffed full of delicious samples of cheese, beef and spicy cider while buying your groceries?

"It's a bit of a Catch-22," says Fearnley Whittingstall. "The customers need a wide range of produce and the farmers need enough customers to make it worth their while. The more people make the commitment, the better and more frequent these markets will become."

For the lazy, there's an even easier option. The Organic Directory, which can be found online at www.soilassociation.org, lists a staggering number of box delivery schemes that distribute seasonal produce from locations all over the country. They range from the basic to the amazingly comprehensive.

But a word of warning: seasonal food may be fresher, tastier and a huge relief for the environment (peas don't need to be air-freighted from Zimbabwe, for example), but you can't give Mother Nature a shopping list. With most schemes, you get what you're given. It's an inspiring challenge for adventurous cooks, but several kilos of lovely, seasonal carrots won't be much use if your dinner party was depending on the ingredients for an apricot soufflé.

Even for those of us who are wedded to the supermarket, healthy organic food doesn't have to be just a good intention. Some supermarkets keep their organic products together in a dedicated section, while others store organic versions of their products alongside non-organic stock.

You will also notice that much organic produce in supermarkets comes pre-packaged. This is to avoid any confusion with non-organic produce and the packaging is recycled wherever possible. Where produce is sold loose, proof of certification must be available, by law, to consumers.
