Youth today is a mixture of good and bad characters as always

(56) _____, there has been concern that youth attitudes have changed as living standards have risen and that young people have become less empathetic. But is this true?

It is certainly the case that (57) _____. They believe that everything they do is important and are intolerant when they are criticised.

(58) _____ they are sometimes known as the 'Me-generation' as opposed to the 'We-generation': egotistic and lacking self-discipline. It is perhaps no coincidence that this attitude reflects the behaviour of media celebrities that many young people seem obsessed by. When they mix, they only mix with people like themselves, a situation encouraged by the advent of online social networking.

On the other hand, in some countries younger people are volunteering for charity work in greater numbers than ever before, and are more concerned about social inequalities than their parents. (59) _____, they also have a far higher tolerance of other people's beliefs than ever before, opposing discrimination against minorities and believing strongly in equal rights.

In other words, the picture is contradictory. It is my firm belief that young people are probably much the same as they have always been. The social conditions of the country they live in are bound to have an effect but in general (60) _____.
