School memories

There used to be about thirty or more housemasters at Repton and most of them were ___1___ and completely uninterested in boys. But Corkers, an eccentric old bachelor, was neither dull ___2___ colorless. Corkers was a charmer, a vast ungainly man with drooping bloodhound cheeks and filthy clothes. He used to ___3___ creaseless flannel trousers and a brown tweed jacket with patches all over it and bits of dried food on the lapels. He ___4___ to teach us mathematics, but in truth he taught us nothing at all and that was the way he meant it to be. His lessons used to consist ___5___ an endless series of distractions all invented by him so that the subject of mathematics ___6___ to be discussed. He would come lumbering into the classroom and sit down at his desk and glare at the class. We would wait expectantly wondering ___7___ was coming next.

"Let's have a look at the crossword puzzle in today's Times", he would say, fishing a crumple newspaper out of his jacket pocket. That'll be ___8___ fiddling around with a lot of figures. I hate figures. Figures are perhaps the dreariest things on this earth."

"Then why do you teach mathematics, sir?" somebody asked him.

"I don't," he said smiling slyly. "I only pretend ___9___ it"

Corkers would proceed to draw the framework of the crossword on the blackboard and we would all spend the rest of the lesson trying to solve it ___10___ he read out the clues. We enjoyed that.
