Compréhension orale

Listen and fill in the gaps with the missing words :

Jake: Ok, Abby, I was kind of wondering whether or not, you know, making a time capsule was something very in your country, in the United States.

Abby: Yeah, time capsules are actually really important to a lot of young kids in the United States.

Jake: And yourself, what was your time capsulelike?

Abby: I did not do a time capsule through school, it was not an assignment, I actually did one with one of my best friends. The first year of high- school we made a box that we....., and we put a bunch of things in it that we would open when we graduated high school four years later. We wrote a letter to ourselves, we a letter to each other, wein a piece of our hair, we put in aof our friends and other little things like that, and Ifour years was going to take forever but I realized that time went quicker than I thought. We actually put it in her attic. So, on the floor, in the highest in her house, and we opened it after we graduated.

Jake: And looking back, Abby, do you feel like this activity is important like why would it be important to do something likea time capsule?

Abby: Oh it's, I think it's really important. It's a good way to check in with yourself to see how much you've grown over the years, and it would be interesting to do one that I keptunderground for longer than four years, 'cause four years really is not that.....

Jake: Yeah, maybe you should one now, and we can open it later and see what's inside.

Abby: That would be really cool.
