The South American Amazon Rainforest is often called the botanical lungs of the planet. Covering more than five-and-a-half million square kilometres, it additionally provides a natural habitat for over half of the Earth's most significant species of plants and animals in an area that is a little larger than half of the world's remaining rainforest.

Unfortunately, over the last four decades, this huge lush expanse has been ever more endangered by deforestation. During the 1960s and up to the 1990s, thousands of trees were felled, but what farmers did not realise is that the topsoil, when denuded of trees, is only considered cultivable for a short period of time.

This means the farmers have to clear more and more land to continue running a profitable and productive business. Despite the reduction in the number of trees being felled, the forest is still slowly disappearing, diminishing the biodiversity of the area and having a terrible global impact, as fewer trees means it has less capacity to clean the air we breathe.
