'GO WEST, YOUNG MAN!'

'Go West, young man!' said an American newspaper in 1850. And thousands of Americans went.

But people started moving to the American West nearly fifty years earlier. In 1803, American president Thomas Jefferson, bought thousands of kilometres of land from the French for fifteen million dollars. The land was west of the Mississippi River and east of the Rocky Mountains. (In today's United States you can find Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Arkansas, and Louisiana there.)

The next year, Jefferson asked two men to go through this land to the Pacific. 'When you find flowers and trees by the road, look carefully at them and write about them,' Jefferson said. 'And talk to the people, too.' These two men were Meriwether Lewis and William Clark. In May 1804, Lewis and Clark went west with forty-six men. It was November 1805 when they arrived at the Pacific.

These were the early years of the 'Wild West'. A time when the names Kit Carson, Sitting Bull, Wyatt Earp, Wild Bill Hickok, Butch Cassidy, Annie Oakley, and many more, became famous across America.

Mountain Men

The 1830s and 1840s were the years of the 'mountain men'. They lived in the mountains, killed animals there, and sold the skins to make money. Sometimes they took people through the mountains. They knew the best trails, and were often good friends with the Indians.

The Pony Express

At first, getting letters from the East to the West of America was slow. Then, in 1860, came the Pony Express. Its horses and riders were fast. *

They travelled from St Joseph in Missouri to Sacramento in California. Every rider travelled 120 kilometres before giving his bag of letters to the next rider. The 3,120 kilometres from St Joseph to Sacramento took twenty-six riders ten days in all.
