I've seen quite a lot of films about survivors but my favourite is a true story about an English mountaineer called Joe Simpson. He climbed a very dangerous mountain, Siula Grande in Peru, in 1985 with his friend and partner Simon Yates. Joe and Simon wanted to be the first people to climb the West Face of the mountain.

When they started the weather was fine but then it changed. The two climbers reached the top successfully but then they had to get back down quickly because of the bad weather. Unfortunately Joe then fell and broke his leg. Simon tried to help his friend get down the mountain. He tied him onto a long rope but the weather got worse and he had to make a terrible decision. He had to cut the rope that was holding Joe or die.

Simon cut the rope and Joe fell into a big hole. Luckily Joe found a way out of the hole at the bottom. It took him three days to get down the rest of the mountain. With his broken leg he could only move very slowly. He had no food or water and when he got to the camp he was nearly dead. But he got there and he lived!

Joe wrote a book called 'Touching the Void' about the experience and in 2003 director Kevin MacDonald made a film with the same title. Since his adventure Joe has had lots of operations on his leg. Doctors told him never to climb again. But he has! He has also written several books and given lots of presentations about climbing. In my opinion 'Touching the Void' is the best film about survival that I've ever seen.
