

The purpose of a hook is to capture or hook the reader's attention in the very first sentence of your essay. For the independent essay, there are two types of hook: simple and complex. A simple hook uses the information in the prompt. In the following examples, notice how the hook comes first, followed by the transition and the opinion. Combined, they form the general introduction of your essay, G.

introduction (G) = hook + transition + opinion personally speaking, in my opinion, as far as I'm concerned, I believe, I posit, I think

c. Pro-Con Hook

For this hook, state the pro (positive) side and the con (negative) side of the topic. Next, write a transition, then state your opinion, for example:

G Some people think that we don't need zoos while others think that we do. Personally speaking, I posit that we need zoos.

1. Before an important exam, do you think it is better to prepare for a long time or only for a few days?
2. What are the advantages and disadvantages of living in a foreign country?
3. When is the best time to go on a vacation?

Conclusion Strategies

d. Rhetorical Question

For this strategy, start with a transition, restate your opinion, then end with a rhetorical question. A rhetorical question will make your reader think about your argument after your essay has ended.

C Suffice it to say, I think that a new factory in my home town is not a good idea. How would you like a big smelly factory in your backyard?

C In my estimation, I believe that telecommuting has many advantages. Don't you wish you could just fall out of bed and go to work in your pajamas?

In sum, In conclusion, As I have illustrated, in the end, In the final analysis, in sum, finally, when all is said and done, In closing.

1. Before an important exam, do you think it is better to prepare for a long time or only for a few days?
2. What are the advantages and disadvantages of living in a foreign country?
3. When is the best time to go on a vacation?