ALL ABOARD?

Britain's biggest budget airline has denied that passengers on a delayed flight from Malaga to Bristol were asked to vote on whether they wanted to take off (1) ___.

Flight EZY9058 from Malaga had originally been due to take off shortly before midnight on Thursday 8th June, but the flight was delayed (2) ___. The 150 passengers had been waiting for 36 hours in hotels in Malaga before they were finally able to re-board the Airbus. On Saturday afternoon, they eventually left their hotels and boarded the plane. They were sitting inside the plane (3) ___, when the pilot told them that there was still a problem with one of the engines.

He then asked if the passengers, who were by now extremely frustrated and angry, (4) ___, or remain on board while he was trying to start the engines. However, the Daily Mail reported that the pilot had told passengers that (5) ___ they would fly with only one engine working, and asked the passengers whether they wanted to remain on the plane or get off.

After a further delay, easyJet provided a replacement aircraft to take the passengers back to Bristol. They finally landed in the UK at 6pm sharp on Saturday 10th June, (6)___.

A	waiting to take off;
B	because of problems with the plane;
C	or maybe later;
D	there was a high chance;
E	with only one engine working;
F	he didn't know what to do;
G	40 hours behind schedule;
H	would like to get off the plane.
