ZERO AND FIRST CONDITIONAL

Read the following sentences and answer the questions below.

If the lizard puts a food somewhere wet, its skin pulls the water up and over its whole body.

The lizard hides if it gets scared.

If we are successful, the device will provide water for people who live in very dry environments.

Conditional sentences have two parts. Match the parts with their functions.

If - clause	Describes the result of the even.
main clause	Describes a possible event.

When the conditional sentence begins with the if-clause, what do we use between the two parts?

Next to each characteristic write "zero" "first" or "both" in order to identify the conditional that is being described.

1. Present tense is used in both if-clause and main clause.

2. We can use either the word if or when for stating a condition.

3. Describes future events and the expected results of those events.

4. Describe events and results that are regularly true.

5. Present tense is used in the if – clause and future form (will) in the main clause
