Hundreds line up for free health care

Volunteers for RAM, the U.S. medical charity, travel from state to state delivering free healthcare, and rent community centers for a day in each place they visit. When they arrive at the community center in Tennessee at 3:00 a.m. to start a long day's work, they find hundreds of people already waiting in line. These people are all in need of medical help, but too poor to pay for it. Many have slept in the parking lot overnight, as they know that if they arrived any later, they might miss their chance to see the charity's doctors, dentists, and eye specialists. Soon everyone is inside the community center, and the doctors start doing an initial health screening. More than 50 dental chairs are set up and all are soon full. Volunteer dentist Danny Chacko says the poor, whether they work or not, simply can't afford to pay for expensive procedures like having a tooth pulled. He's been on many RAM expeditions before and hopes that the number of volunteers will increase. "Let's not forget the people who need this kind of care ... that could just as easily be one of us sitting in that chair."

At the far end of the community center, eye specialists are performing various vision tests. Ophthalmologist Paul Wittke says the RAM clinic can grind out more than 300 pairs of new prescription glasses a day. "That's our biggest thing, I think. We help a lot of people out with their glasses," says Wittke.
