Teachers praise the habitats as valuable learning tools. To students in habitat programs, for example, photosynthesis is not just something to learn from a book. Children can study their own plants as the plants complete this process of so combining water and carbon dioxide. They learn that plants can use light to make it the energy that keeps the plant alive.

Both fiction and nonfiction have pros and cons. Chances are high that your students will be using more nonfiction reading than fiction at this point in their education. In many cases, textbooks, recipes and other practical guides there are going to be used by your students more than novels or storybooks. However, it's a so good idea to give them some experience in each type of reading.
