It's easy to out with friends. Stupid arguments can a good friendship, and people who were once can develop different interests and social circles, and slowly apart. If people move to different areas and don't regularly with each other, then it can be hard to maintain a friendship. In short, friendship dies if some of the reasons why you up the friendship in the first place go away. A team at an Ohio university who interviewed hundreds of people found three things that make the difference between a passing acquaintance and a friendship that will for life. According to the study, a life-long friend is someone that you can always talk to, depend on and enjoy being with. If you can describe your friend in these terms then the chances are that you have with that person for life.
