COMPANY RULES AND REGULATIONS

Part of the reasoning behind the law generally giving employers the discretion to dictate personal computer usage policies in the workplace is that since employers own the computers, they also own the data transmitted to and from the computers, whatever the source may be. Another reason justifying an employer's ability to monitor personal computer use in the workplace is security.

Security also may be an issue in terms of employees violating company confidentiality rules. By monitoring personal internet usage, employers can ensure that employees are not disseminating confidential information about the company to the public.
