Mr. Nishiura, a 25-year-old lorry driver from western Japan, was sacked because he dyed his hair brown. (This is a popular fashion with young Japanese.) Although he apologized and dyed it black again, he was still sacked. His employer, Mr Yamago, believed that behaviour like Mr. Nishiura's made company discipline worse and ruined morale. He blamed it on American influence. "We need drivers to keep a professional appearance to make a good impression", he said. A Japanese journalist said, "Japanese firms expect all employees to look the same and think the same. When you come into a company, you sign away your human rights." Mr. Nishiura is going to sue his employer for unreasonable dismissal.
