Koko and Michael were gorillas who learned how to "speak" to humans using sign language. Sign language is a type of communication where people use their hands to show letters and words. Koko first learned words which she needed, like food, eat, and more. In the first year, she only learned a few words. But by the time she was five, she knew more than 500 words.

The hands of a gorilla are a little different to human hands, and sometimes, the teachers had to change the sign so Koko and Michael could make it more easily. Koko and Michael could also understand when humans spoke English to them, because their teachers always used sign language and said the words at the same time. Koko and Michael sometimes invented new signs when they didn't know a word. For example, to sign the word yogurt, Michael signed milk, fruit, candy, and food.
