KUALA LUMPUR: Implementation of the home-based teaching and learning (PdPR) for students nationwide is not only a challenge to parents but teachers and students as well as they have to face various issues.

A teacher at a school in Putrajaya said the attendance of online classes among students from the "back classes" was quite low.

"For example, student attendance from the first class is 24 out of a total of 27, while the rate among students from the back classes is 6 out of 19 people.

"Students who are good in their studies will survive while the weak will continue to be left behind.

"In school, teachers can call students face to face and motivate them, but when the class is conducted online, it depends on the students themselves, their preparation in terms of gadgets, data plan and self-motivation," he said.

Syakir Fazly, 15, a Form Three student of a school in Selangor, finds it tough to focus on his lessons when studying at home because of his "noisy siblings".

"It is difficult for me to listen to the teacher and other students. When a student has a question, the teacher just continues to teach because the teacher is unable to hear the question and the student's voice.

"Apart from that, not everything that is taught by the teacher can be clearly understood because the telephone screen is small. The link provided by the teacher is always difficult to access," he added.

Hairunnisak Aman, 39, from Johor, who has three children in primary school, said PdPR not only demanded high discipline from students, but parents too had to play their role to ensure their children stay focused.

"It is quite challenging because it requires a high level of commitment to participate in the Google Meet, Google Classroom, Telegram or WhatsApp sessions for three children who are all in primary school at the same time.

"However, for now, I can still find time to monitor them," said the food caterer.
