The story continues . . . The island Irvine and Kingsland were to live on was Tuin, situated in the Torres Strait between the north coast of Australia and Papua New Guinea. As living there was 1. _____ by law, they needed Australia's permission for this unusual experiment to take place. In addition, Australian law required the couple to be legally married in order to continue with their plan, and Irvine eventually agreed.

At first sight, the island looked like paradise, with white beaches lined with palm trees, and clear blue water in an untouched bay. Unfortunately, however, their experience was 2. _____—as a source of drinking water 3. _____ highest on their list of survival needs, the pair had to set up camp on a less attractive part of Tuin. Over time, the stress caused by the enforced marriage, and the fact that their opinions on how to survive were so 4. _____, caused deep problems in their relationship. Ultimately, the difficulties of working together proved too great, and despite the 5. _____ of their surroundings, the adventure, although lasting a year, was unsuccessful.
