The Write Tribe

DISCURSIVE WRITING:

What is the difference between discursive and argumentative essays?

Discursive Compositions	Argumentative Compositions
The questions end with "Discuss".	Questions end with "Do you agree?" Alternative, they might compel writers to make a stand through the use of absolute terms such as "always", "definitely" etc.
Focus is on explaining one's perspectives and thoughts.	Focus is on making a stand on an argument and providing elaboration and examples to reinforce this stand.
Writing is often balanced, with arguments on both sides of the issue.	Writing is often inclined towards the writer's stand and often offers a counter argument, of which it is often rebutted.
Focus is more on the expression and clarity of the writers' thoughts and perspectives.	Focus is more on being persuasive, convincing the readers to the writers' point of view.

Types of Discursive essay questions?

Discursive essays:

The ideal goal.

"Life is not fair." Discuss.

"Kindness begets kindness." What are your views?

What are your thoughts on introducing ebooks to the young?

What are the possible solutions to eliminate or reduce haze in Singapore?

Types of Argumentative essay questions?

“Teachers should always trust their students.” Do you agree?

“Teenagers should be closely supervised by their parents.” Do you agree?

Are children from rich families always happier than those from impoverished families?

Is technology definitely beneficial to the young?

(Note: the third and fourth questions above use “absolute terms” such as “always” and “definitely” to compel writers to write only in a specific direction reinforcing a specific stand. And because it needs to be persuasive, these are argumentative questions, and not discursive questions.)

Up till this point, one can observe that discursive and argumentative essays can easily be differentiated with markers such as “discuss”, “what are your views”, “do you agree” etc.

However, sometimes, the questions cannot be differentiated into discursive and argumentative writing that easily.

For example, consider the following questions:

1. Are leaders born or nurtured?
2. Is it necessary to control the media?
3. Are experiences on a job more important than paper qualifications?
4. Is youth an advantage or disadvantage?

5. Is it better to have one long school vacation than to have a few short ones?

For the five questions above, students have the flexibility to write a discursive essay stating both sides of the arguments, or an argumentative essay with strong emphasis on the students' stand.

As to which is a better choice, it is actually a personal choice of students, assuming that they have the ability to write both types of writing well.

Format of Discursive Essays

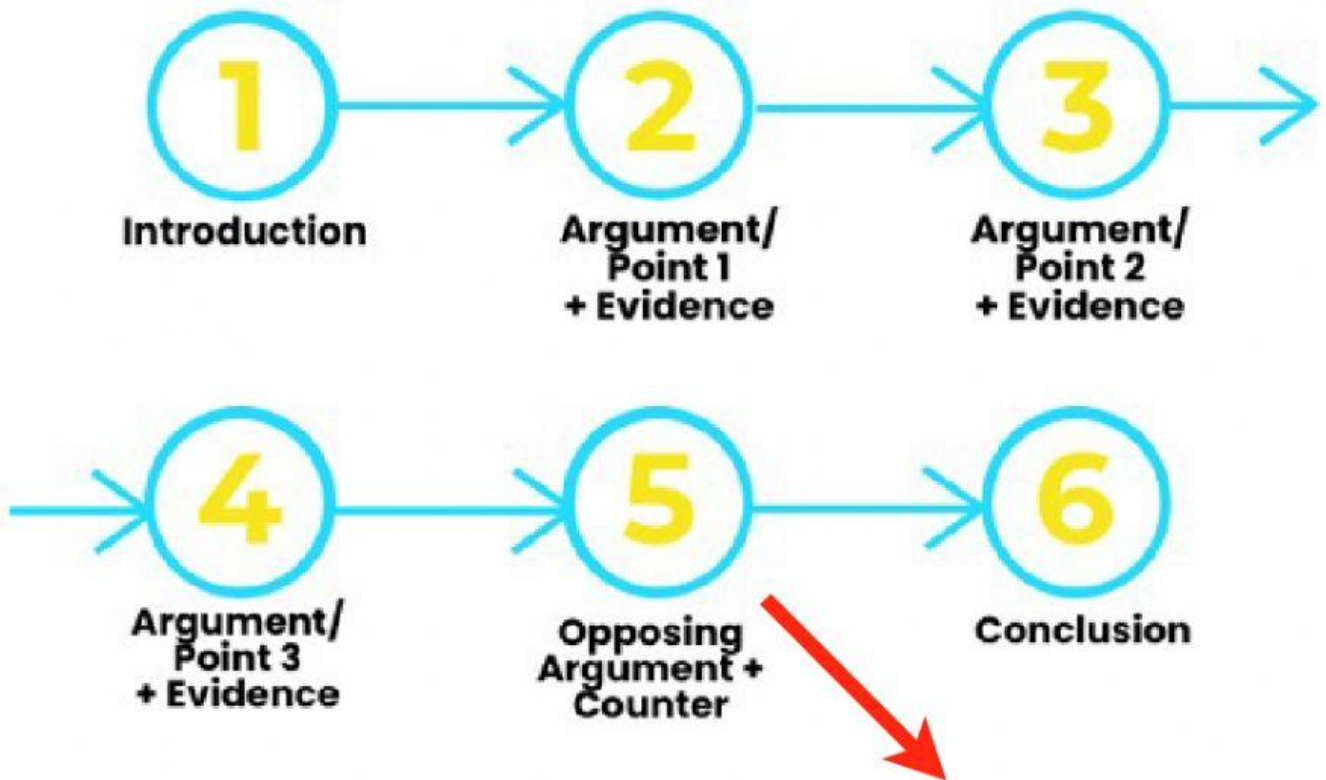

The baseline difference between Argumentative and Discursive is innate to definition. As the terms imply, an argumentative essay requires you to argue towards an explicit stand. Its individual points and structure revolve around putting across and strengthening this stand to convince the reader.

Discursive, on the other hand, requires you to discuss an issue as is, primarily to educate the reader. Thus, there isn't a need to take an explicit stand or frame its points towards one.

It is important to distinguish this main difference between the two early-on; missing the purpose of the text type causes our writing to go haywire and become severely penalized.

Discursive Essay Structure

Most important element of discursive is to dedicate an entire paragraph for a counter argument.

Model Discursive Essay

“Fear is good.” Discuss.

Fear is the bad feeling that one has when he is in danger or when a particular thing frightens him. A German proverb goes, “Fear makes the wolf bigger than he is.” This is absolutely true as fear will often cause people to imagine the worst and act irrationally. In that case, can fear be any good? Personally, I think a small amount of fear is good and even necessary as it not only acts as a form of control and deterrence but also serves to motivate oneself. Nonetheless, being overly fearful is bad as it will severely hamper man’s progress. In this essay, I will discuss how fear can be a double-edged sword, bringing both advantages and disadvantages to man.

Fear is good as it deters people from doing dangerous acts and prompt them to control and regulate their behaviour. For instance, despite the numerous wars since World War Two, the atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki in Japan remain the only use of nuclear weapons in warfare. This is because the world is fearful of the widespread devastation that such weapons will bring about. Therefore, the fear of total annihilation has prevented world leaders from acting irresponsibly and going down the path of self-destruction.

Next, fear is good as it is a powerful motivator. For individuals such as students and entrepreneurs, the fear of failure will prompt them to work hard and put in their best effort in their studies and business undertakings. This will lead to results and progress. Similarly for nations, the fear of losing their competitive edge will spur them to constantly improve and reinvent themselves to keep pace with the fast-changing world. For example, Singapore is taking active steps to maintain and improve her skilled and flexible workforce to ensure that she remains competitive and does not fall behind major economies like China. Retraining schemes and upgrading courses have been provided for the workforce to ensure that it stays relevant. Hence, we can see that the fear of losing out to others is one of the reasons that has motivated nations to take active steps in improving their economies. Without fear, nations will become complacent and they will eventually fall into a decline.

However, although fear is good, man must keep in mind that too much fear may be detrimental to his development. Being overly fearful of the unknown and intangible will prevent people from venturing into areas previously unexplored. For instance, in the area of space exploration, Apollo 11 would have never landed the first humans on the moon if the Americans had let fear get in the way of their dream. As the late John F. Kennedy once said, “We choose to go to the moon in this decade and do the other things not because they are easy, but because they are hard.” To achieve great feats, man must learn to conquer his fear and find the courage to overcome the obstacles that life presents. Only then can the human race continue to make progress and enjoy the sweet smell of success.

Counter-argument paragraph

In sum, fear is good as it will ultimately lead to a well controlled and motivated society. Nevertheless, people must keep in mind that they should not be clouded by fear as it will hinder their progress. I believe that a small dose of fear and a good deal of courage will make a great man as such a man will have the spirit to pursue his goals and the sense to act responsibly in the process.
