B7. Should we try to bring back extinct species? The idea of its bringing back extinct species sounds like science fiction, but some every scientists now believe it could be a real possibility. Of course no one who intends to create twenty-first century dinosaurs, but some conservationists very want to persuade scientists to use modern understanding of genes to clone species that have recently died out. Critics point out that such many people might object to spending money on extinct animals, when it could be better targeted at saving the many more that are currently endangered either. They also have point out that bringing back extinct species would mean protecting their habitats, otherwise we would risk giving them a second chance at life only to be let them die out again. Other scientists believe it could in theory be as possible to see extinct animals roaming the Earth. However we feel about this, we can't go on allowing more animals to disappear them forever.
