Gregory Kats, a computer engineering student at a New York university, recently gave passengers on a New York subway train quite a shock. The student was carrying a school project inside his backpack: a model of an elevator, which contained a small battery, wires and a motor. Unfortunately, the model elevator started burning inside his backpack and the fire frightened people around him. Gregory told the travellers that it was only a school assignment, but people thought it was a bomb and ran away in panic. The police soon arrived and questioned him in detail, but they later let him go and Gregory said he was sorry for the trouble.
