Life on other planets

Fourteen-year-old Nick Miller talks about his science project

To support some kind of life, a planet needs liquid water between 0°C to 100°C. Liquid water can be on or under the surface. Besides liquid water, living things also need nutrients including carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen. Another important thing is the atmosphere. If a planet has a thick atmosphere, it can stop space rocks from hitting the planet. A thick atmosphere generally means a warmer surface temperature. If a planet has a thin atmosphere, things from space can hit the surface, which is what happened to our moon. I think there might be life on Mars. Mars is quite cold and has a thin atmosphere, but it has enough nutrients, and it may have a little liquid water. What do you think?
