So, we're looking at buildings in ancient Egypt again today. Last week, we talked about the pharaohs and the pyramids. Today, I want to talk about the life of an ordinary Egyptian family. This is a picture of their house. They were not a rich family, but their house was well-built. It had two floors. The entrance to the house was through a wooden gate. Downstairs, there was a room for animals to sleep in. And upstairs, there were bedrooms for the family. There wasn't a lot of furniture in the rooms-- just rugs on the floor to sleep on. Also, you can see that the windows were small. This is because they wanted light, but they didn't want a lot of hot sun coming in. There were stairs to go up to the bedrooms. The roof of the house was flat. The family used the roof as a place to eat. They had lunch and sometimes their evening meal there. They also slept there when it was too hot inside. Some families had houses with only one floor, and then their animals slept outside. But rich families had a big garden in the middle of their house. They grew flowers and vegetables there.
