There are five main parts in the plot of a story: the exposition, the rising action, the climax, the falling action, and the resolution. The exposition is the beginning of the story, where the writer introduces the characters, the setting, and the main conflicts. These serve as the background for upcoming events. From the exposition, readers can understand (31) _____ the characters behave or respond as they do. The rising action refers (32) _____ the part of the story after the exposition where the characters are faced with conflicts. The rising action may include a series of events that lead up to the climax of the story. The climax is often a turning (33) _____ in the characters' lives when they have to face the most difficult challenge. The falling action comes immediately after that to describe the consequences - (34) _____ good or bad - that the characters have to deal with. The resolution part tells us how the main problem is worked out and this is (35) _____ the story ends.
