Recovery credits are a type of financial assistance that is offered to people who have fallen behind on their payments. This could happen for many reasons, such as a job loss, unexpected medical expenses, or other financial hardship.

People or businesses that borrow money from other people or companies are called debtors, and the people or companies they borrow money from become creditors.

If the debtor can't pay back the money right away, they might agree to a payment plan, which is a schedule that says how much they will pay each time, until the full amount is paid back.

If the debtor doesn't pay back the money they owe, it means they have defaulted on the loan, which means they didn't fulfill their promise to pay the money back.

When a debtor owes money, they might also have an outstanding balance, which is the amount of money they still owe, even after they've made some payments.

Sometimes, creditors charge extra money, called interest, when they loan money to a debtor. This is called an interest rate.

A credit score is a number that shows how good someone is at paying back the money they borrow.

If a debtor can't pay back the money they owe, the creditor might use a collection agency to help get the money back.

Sometimes, a creditor and a debtor can agree on a settlement, which means the debtor will pay back less than the full amount they owe, but they won't default on the loan.
