Stockholm Syndrome

In 1973, a bank robbery in Stockholm became the first criminal event to be shown live on Swedish television. The robbery, in which Jan-Erik Olsson took four people hostage, lasted for six days. Olsson demanded that a friend be brought from his prison cell to the bank to help him keep an eye on the hostages. Despite the threats made against them, the hostages sympathised with their captors and not only refused to give evidence against them in court but actually raised money for Olsson's defence.

After the case, the phrase "Stockholm Syndrome" started to be used to describe the hostages' feelings towards their captors. In 1975, the film Dog Day Afternoon, based on a 1972 robbery in New York, was released. A young Al Pacino played the robber in a way that made it easy to see why the hostages sympathised with him. In the same year as the film came out, Patty Hearst, daughter of a millionaire publisher, was arrested. She had been kidnapped about a year and a half earlier but had subsequently been seen joining in the group's criminal activities, even carrying a gun at one point. Although her lawyer claimed that she had been suffering from Stockholm Syndrome, she was found guilty and sentenced to seven years in prison.

Psychologists are still trying to understand what causes the condition. There are several theories but, as the Al Pacino film showed, when victims and criminals interact, criminals often show their humanity. Olsson gave his jacket to one woman who felt cold. He also sympathised with another woman who couldn't get through to her husband on the phone and he encouraged her to keep trying.

Whatever the reason, when the siege in Stockholm ended, the two criminals and their victims hugged and kissed before the criminals were taken away, with the hostages pleading with police officers not to hurt the two men.
