The first computer games

We have played computer games for about 60 years, and now games are very sophisticated. But, did you know that the first computer game was a version of noughts and crosses? It was in black and white and it was very simple. A scientist called A.S. Douglas designed it in 1952.

In 1962, an American computer engineer created 'SpaceWar!' His name was Steve Russell. He loved reading science-fiction books so he wanted to invent the first science-fiction game. If you play the game today, it will seem very simple and boring, but it was an amazing invention in 1962.

Nowadays, most young people enjoy playing computer games at home on their computers or consoles, but in the 1970s and 1980s teenagers didn't have computers. They went to arcades to play the new, exciting computer games.

In the future, computer games will inevitably change. Major companies are spending a lot of money on developing very realistic games, and some games are going to have so many levels that you will never finish the game!
