Caring About the Elephants

I If you've ever been to Thailand or know someone who has, chances are you've heard about the famous elephant rides there. Up until the late 1980s, elephants were used in the logging industry to transport heavy pieces of wood, but this ended when logging became illegal in 1989. As a result, elephant owners were forced to find alternative ways of earning money, and so resorted to training elephants to give tourists rides. The training process involves cruel treatment of the animals, rewarding them with food and water for good behaviour.

II Ironically, this time period coincided with the advent of ecotourism, and Thailand was a popular destination. Ecotourism encourages people to visit and experience an unspoilt area in a respectful and sensitive manner. It makes sense, then, that as ecotourism surged at a rate of about 20-35% annually, the awareness and suspicion of the elephant ride phenomenon grew accordingly.

III Baby elephants have long been a favourite of tourists and are the easiest to tame, so they are most at risk of being captured by ruthless poachers. What many people don't know, and what helps explain the resulting trauma of both the captured babies and the remaining herd in the wild, is that elephants are strikingly similar to humans. Both are intelligent creatures with strong social and familial ties and the ability to remember things and recognise others.

IV Luckily, the increased interest in ecotourism and sensitivity to the environment has led people to pay attention to the elephants' plight. Consequently, this has resulted in successful efforts to educate the public, specifically potential tourists. What they learn is that although riding an elephant might seem harmless, it contributes to severe animal abuse. While riding elephants is unfortunately still practised, it is swiftly losing its appeal and instead, other more elephant-friendly attractions are gaining in popularity.

V Elephant Nature Park (ENP), an elephant sanctuary in Thailand, was established by Thai native Lek Chailert, and is committed to rescuing elephants and improving their treatment. At ENP, tourists enjoy interacting with the elephants in ways that are fun for animals and people alike. Lek hopes that when visitors spread the word about their positive experiences, others will visit and help save Thailand's elephants as well.
