USA PROTESTS

First News Reporter

Although US President Donald Trump called George's death a tragedy, he has also been accused of glorifying violence, after threatening protesters in a tweet that said: "when the looting starts, the shooting starts".

For the first time in Mr Trump's presidency, Twitter tagged the tweet with a message that said it "violated [broke] their rules about glorifying violence". Twitter hid the tweet but did not remove it as they feel "it is in the public's interest" to see it.

At a speech in Minneapolis, the brother of George Floyd spoke at a rally, where he called for "peace" and "justice" through voting, rather than violence.

As First News went to press, the National Guard (the US reserve military force for domestic emergencies) was being sent to several states across the country.

During his arrest, George Floyd, who is black, died after white police officer Derek Chauvin knelt on his neck. The officer has since been charged with murder, while three other police officers involved in the arrest have lost their jobs.

Protests against police violence and racial hatred then began in Minneapolis, before quickly spreading across the world, as people took to the streets to campaign against the police using unnecessary force against black people in the US.

There were demonstrations everywhere, including UK cities London, Cardiff and Manchester. Celebrities including Ariana Grande and Halsey joined in protests in the States too.

The majority of the protesters walked peacefully, carrying Black Lives Matter signs and calling for justice. But in some parts of the US, demonstrations became violent.
