Section 1

Reading

- A. Read the article about a car. For questions 1–5, choose the answer (A, B, C or D) which you think fits best according to the text.

Folding car

There's a new type of car around called a micro-EV (electric vehicle). Though electric and hybrid cars, which are powered by both a petrol engine and batteries, have been around for a while, this one is different. It folds up so its length of 2.5 metres shortens to 1.5 metres when it is not being driven. This means that seven of these vehicles can fit into a normal parking space. It is also unique because it is the first car originally designed for use in city car-share programmes.

The idea is that cities would have fleets of these cars strategically placed at charging points throughout a city and its suburbs in the same way as many cities already have bicycle-sharing schemes, where you rent and pick up a bike from a particular point and drop it off at another point at the end of your journey. The trouble with bikes though, is that some people can't or don't want to use them, particularly in bad weather. You could argue that people could use public transport to get around cities, which is true, but urban planners have identified what they call a 'first and last mile' problem. This refers to the situation where people don't live or work within walking distance of a place to take public transport. Micro-EVs are intended to solve this problem. It would encourage car users to leave them at home, therefore reducing road congestion, carbon emissions and fuel and parking costs for drivers.

The idea of a compact folding electric city car came from America, at the Michigan Institute of Technology (MIT) and was taken up by a group of businesspeople from the Basque part of Spain. With financial help from the Spanish government, which provided around a quarter of the development budget, they formed a company that built the Hiriko Fold. Hiriko comes from two Basque words and means 'from the city'.

Apart from being small and light, there are some other special features. There is no steering wheel for a start. Instead, you steer with an aircraft style control which you move forwards to go ahead and faster, back to slow down and reverse and left or right to turn. The wheels also rotate 60 degrees, which means you can almost move sideways. That will help with parking in tight spaces. You and your passenger get in and out by lifting up a door at the front, which is also the windscreen. It's not particularly cheap or fast with a top speed of just 50km an hour and a maximum range of about 120km before the batteries need recharging, but that only takes 15 minutes. So it's not meant for motorway driving, but as a solution for urban transport, this could possibly take off. In some countries, you may not need a licence to drive it because it weighs less than 500kg, so it could be registered as a quadricycle –a four-wheeled bike – rather than a car.

1 What does the first paragraph say is new about the micro-EV?

- A It can change shape.
- B It is battery driven.
- C It was the first car to be used in some cities.
- D It needs to be parked in a special way.

2 Micro-EVs might be a solution for people who

- A don't want to use public transport.
- B think cycling in cities is sometimes dangerous.
- C are far from a public transport route.
- D want free transport around cities.

3 Who built the Hiriki Fold?

A MIT

B The Spanish government

C A Basque company

D Two organisations

4 The Hiriki Fold

A can't go backwards.

B isn't driven like other cars.

C has two doors.

D has a problem with going sideways.

5 One disadvantage of the Hiriki Fold is that it

A isn't heavy enough to be registered as a car.

B can't be recharged very quickly.

C is too slow for most city roads.

D costs quite a lot.™
