

Listen and fill in the gaps

I travel around the world and I usually stay with friends, not in hotels. I always take photos of my friends and last year I started taking photos of their [] too. It's amazing what a [] can tell you about a person. Look at this picture. You can see right away it's a single person – probably lives alone. There isn't much food in this [] and maybe he doesn't like cooking. There's some [] food here, Chinese [] There's not a lot of food, but he's got some [], some [] and an [] up here. Oh and some [] I know he's a big [] eater; let's see, has he got any []? OK, in this photo he hasn't got any [], but I know he likes []. Look at all these [] and [] – I mean, he tries to be []. And I know him well. His name's Vinnie and he lives in New York City. He's single, a businessman, a quiet, serious guy. He buys [] and [], but he doesn't often cook; he often has [] food or goes out to []

Look at this one. All this food – they've got some [] here, some chicken – a roast chicken, ready to eat – and there's a big [] and some really nice [] They've got all this [] because they do a lot of exercise and they like having [] with them when they go running or play tennis. You can see they try to be very [] – just look at all that fresh food. But the main thing is, all this food is ready to cook. That tells me that these people are friendly; they like having friends for [] And it's true, Mike and Liz are really friendly and I love staying with them because they're funny and intelligent and there are always lots of people around in their apartment. I stay with them every time I go to Lisbon.