One way the success of a country's film industry can [1]measure/(be measured) is by the number of films produced each year. But other factors have to [2]consider/be considered, such as how much money is invested in a film and how much money the film [3]makes/is made. The British film industry has always had more enthusiasm than money – as a timeline of its fortunes shows.

In the 1940s British cinema was hugely successful and 1.4 billion cinema tickets [4]sold/were sold every year.

By the late 1950s this figure [5]had fallen/had been fallen to around 500 million. Films began to [6]make/be made that appealed specifically to both American and British viewers in order to guarantee profitability.

The 1960s was a decade of quality British film making. In 1962 the first James Bond film [7]released/was released, along with the classic Lawrence of Arabia. However, over the next ten years audiences continued to [8]fall/be fallen to just 193 million in 1970.

In fact, the 1970s were disastrous for British film. Little money was [9]investing/being invested and in 1970 only 24 films [10]produced/were produced in the UK.

The 1990s saw a rebirth of British film making. While the money came from America, the stars and the scripts were [11]providing/provided by the British, with hits such as Four Weddings and a Funeral and Notting Hill.

Now, audiences are [12]increasing/being increased once more and the future for the British film industry looks bright. In 2007 a British-produced film, The Queen, won over 20 awards, including an Oscar for best actress, Helen Mirren.
