

IBM is using the world of a website called Second Life as the next-..... thing to in-person corporate meetings.
The computer maker has established at least one virtual island in Second Life, a popular online virtual world, where it has employee meetings.

Earlier this month, for example, IBM held a virtual party where people around a space called the SkyPOD.

But this isn't the work of teenagers at IBM. Researchers are looking at the business of virtual worlds and online games.

After attending the virtual meeting from IBM's Hursley labs in the U.K. last month, Irving Wladawsky-Berger, IBM's vice president of technical strategy and innovation, said that the use of technologies such as virtual worlds reminded him of how IBM the Internet and a decade ago.

"Once more we have the very strong feeling that this will have a huge impact on business, society and our personal lives, although none of us can quite predict what that impact will be," Wladawsky-Berger wrote in his
