Patagonian Toothfish

As fisheries throughout the world are depleted by destructive fishing practices, fishing companies are turning to the diverse life of the Southern Ocean. One of the major victims of the “gold rush” mentality that has developed among fishing companies is the Patagonian Toothfish.

The Patagonian Toothfish is a truly remarkable fish that plays an important role in the Southern Ocean ecosystem. It grows slowly, and up to more than two meters long. It can live for 50 years and does not breed until it is at least 10 years old. It lives in deep waters (from 300 to 3,500 meters) and is found on sea mounts and continental shelves around most sub-Antarctic islands. Like many deep-sea species, little is known about the Patagonian Toothfish. We do know, however, that it is part of the sperm whale's diet, and scientists estimate that it comprises up to 98 per cent of the elephant seal's fish diet.

In the mid-1980s, overfishing forced dozens of Spanish, South Korean and Japanese industrial fishing vessels out of their national waters. The vessels moved to Chilean waters where they caught fish such as Austral Hake and Golden Kingclip. By the early 1990s, however, overfishing caused the collapse of these fisheries. The industrial fishing fleets then targeted the Patagonian Toothfish. By 1994, fishing for Patagonian Toothfish spread to the coast of Argentina. Illegal, or ‘pirate’, fishing for Toothfish was rampant. When the population of Patagonian Toothfish in South American waters became depleted, the illegal fishers moved eastwards.
