This poem, written by _____, describes a walk in a _____.

The speaker, who speaks in the _____ person, describes an experience of walking in a forest, early in the _____. He reaches a fork where the road splits into two. The road _____ and he has to choose which road to follow. He looks down one of the roads as _____ can see and then chooses the _____ road. He is ambivalent about whether the roads are similar or one is better than the other. He feels that they seem the same and just _____. But he also says that one of them wanted _____, because not many people have walked through it.

Once he decides on a road, he thinks he may come back and try the other road, someday. However, being realistic, he knows that one thing leads _____ and he will probably not return. He is a bit dissatisfied with not being able to take

_____.

He tells us that he had chosen the _____ travelled road; the less popular road, which not many people have chosen. He explains that this specific choice has made _____. It had a great impact on him. We do not know whether this impact was _____.

We can infer that the poem is a metaphor. Frost talks about life (represented by the

_____), where a person must choose from several options (represented by the _____), when faced with a dilemma (represented by the _____). There is also a reason why this poem is set in the _____ season. In literature, _____ often represents a time of change or transition.
