I still remember it very clearly. It was in February 2003. I was thirteen years old and I was living in the USA, in a town called Newsom. C I knew something was wrong because my mum was usually at work at this time and my dad was never home until about 7 o'clock. At last my mum said, 'We know you love it here, and so do we, but your dad got a new job in Sweden.'

I was used to moving. My dad worked for an international organization and moving was part of the job. But now we'd been in the USA for five years, I had lots of friends and I loved school. I didn't want to move again. I was angry, but I had no choice!

The next day at school I told my friends I was moving on the 10th of March. They thought I was going to another town or state in America. They couldn't believe I was going to a different continent. But it was true and we started packing. I had to give away some of my things because I had too much to take. Gradually, I got used to the idea, but on the 9th of March I went round the neighbourhood saying goodbye and sobbing because I knew I was leaving my friends, my school and my life so far behind.

Now I'm seventeen and I've lived in another three countries since leaving America. We lived in Sweden for eight months and in Italy until I was sixteen. We don't have any plans to move right now, but if we do, I won't be upset. I've learned that although moving away from your friends and your home is challenging, there are good things about moving too. As I've got older, I've realized that these are all positive experiences.
