What is beauty? Is it in the faces you see on magazine covers? And why is it valued so highly in our society? Shouldn't we value personality more than looks? Our modern idea of what is beautiful is often the product of clever computer techniques which can easily change faces and bodies to make you look thinner, taller or generally more attractive than you really are. But this isn't natural beauty. People come in all shapes, sizes and colours. The people we see in magazines are fake. And yet, the magazine editors claim that that's what people want to see. They say people wouldn't be interested in buying a magazine with normal looking models in it. But is that true? Fortunately, we are slowly becoming aware that we should aim to be healthy, happy and confident with who we are. Young girls and women are particularly influenced by trends that can harm their health, but they need to realise that they are perfect just as they are.
