Austin's luck finally ran out on day 92 when a cobra bit him on the arm. He [redacted] wanted to break the world record for living in a glass cage with poisonous snakes. [redacted] was as part of a publicity stunt to attract visitors to a snake and animal park in South Africa. His companions had been no [redacted] than 36 deadly snakes. They included 20 cobras [redacted] most dangerous of all, six black mambas [redacted] bite can kill in under a minute. He hadn't been [redacted] to relax for a moment as [redacted] movement which was made excited his "room mates". He fed [redacted] on live mice but had to make sure that he didn't touch them in [redacted] he was mistaken for food too!

By day 92 he had [redacted] been bitten twice, but on both occasions, by a miracle, [redacted] venom entered his bloodstream. One day he even fell on top of a black mamba. Fortunately for him, [redacted] of striking, the mamba shot across to the other side of the cage. When he [redacted] bitten for the third time, Austin could have left the cage but decided to wait for the antidote to arrive. Even though he was in terrible pain, he decided [redacted] he might as well die trying to break the record. As it was, he managed to survive and spent [redacted] further two weeks in the cage to set a new record of 107 days.
