

One Fearful Night

By Sharmane C. Miller

The howling wind whistled through the open bedroom window. Shadows of all shapes and sizes danced on the walls as Linda lay frozen in her bed. Her teeth were chattering from the cold air that filled her room and the fear that gripped her added to her anxiety.

"She clutched her pillow tightly and began to recite a short prayer, 'Now I lay me down to sleep ...'" Suddenly, a gust of wind rushed in. The assignment she had left on her computer desk scattered all over the floor. She sank deeper into her sheets and pulled the blanket over her head.

"Why me?" She thought to herself. "Why is this happening to me?" She knew she would have to get up to bolt her window or face freezing. However, her body would not cooperate. Finally, after much thought, she took a deep breath, threw off her blanket and darted to the window. The violent wind caused the window to bang furiously against the pane. Linda nervously fastened the latch and closed the curtains. It was quiet once again.

Hurriedly, Linda climbed into bed and quickly pulled the covers over her head once again. Without a thought, she continued the prayer she had started earlier, "I pray the Lord my soul to keep ..." With those words, Linda drifted off to sleep.
